

Aeris

Inside in the Greyfen forest a young girl was passing through, she had a basket in hand filled with the berries from surrounding bushes. Her name was Amara, a young 13 year old girl wearing common peasant clothes and heading back to her village. On her way back to the village she spotted one last berry bush, she approached it and began collecting the berries when her hand hit something hard in the bush. She gripped the object, rectangular, and pulled it out. She pulled out a large and dusty book, it looked ancient but what stood out to her the most was the name "Orran's grimoire". A magical notebook, although she didn't recognize the name of the author she didn't really care, magic was something she always wanted to learn, but textbooks were too expensive and she didn't have any money. She flipped through the pages, each filled to the brim with notes and knowledge and landed on what seemed like a simple spell. She raised her hand and pointed at a tree with the grimoire in her other hand

"Aeris!" she shouted, the bushes and leaves around her swirled, a green glow flowed from her arm. The strange green energy flowed into her palm while a powerful wind blew into her face. It left her palm and formed a small green orb in front of her, it compressed and shrunk and at last it launched

"Ahhh!" Suddenly the orb released its power but instead of flowing forward it exploded everywhere and sent Amara flying back into a tree. She landed on the ground after hitting the tree, her hand numb and back aching from the impact. She sat up from the ground and looked around. The tree was unscathed and other than some leaves that were still floating down the place was unchanged. She failed casting the spell and miraculously at that, and to add on it was just a beginner spell at that. After resting she picked up the book and basket and began to head back, after all it was just her first try and she would have a long time to practice.

She emerged from the edge of the forest carrying her stuff and approached her home, the Orphanage. Many years ago Amara's parents were involved in an accident and passed away leaving Amara to live in the orphanage. She walked inside and placed the basket on a counter and took the book to her bed. From then on day after day for hours one end she read and reviewed the book and every week she headed to the back of the orphanage and tested her progress.

But once again week after week barely anything improved. Her attempts failed each and every time. Sometimes she could cast the orb only for it to explode other times it wouldn't even form. And along with her failures came the criticism and ridicule of her efforts from some of the villagers. They formed around her each week and watched her only to laugh and ridicule every time she failed. Today was another test, and just like each other time it was another failure and a bad one at that. The orb formed only to backfire and send her flying backwards, laughs erupting from the crowd

"Just quit girl, your not getting any better"

"Sell the book, it'll be better for you"

"You should stop before you actually hurt yourself"

The group laughed and mocked her, she wanted to retort but the worst part was they were right. After a whole month she barely achieved anything. Water filled her eyes as her hand numb from the backfire, she wiped her eyes and looked up at the forest that gifted her the book. She stands up and runs into the forest to get away from the group. She ran fast and deep into the forest without looking back or down “Ahh!” suddenly she tumbles to the floor, her foot caught on an exposed tree root. She takes a breather collecting her thoughts after the fall. She brushes the dirt off her clothes and looks ahead. A large clearing in the forest, and in the clearing is a boulder, a few feet big. She walked up to the boulder and ran her hand over it. Study as expected and large, a perfect target. After resting for a few more minutes and clearing her mind she left the clearing with a new goal in mind, splitting the boulder in half.

After returning she trained as hard if not harder than before. Each and every week she attempted the spell it failed, even though she was beginning to lose that was until her 26th attempt. She stood before the boulder as usual and aimed her hand, the familiar green energy began to flow. She concentrated with all her might and closed her eyes in preparation for the backfire before shouting “Aeris!”. She stood still waiting, but nothing came. She opened her eyes and looked ahead, nothing changed, or at least it seemed that way.

On the ground was a broken chip from the boulder, a single chip. After over six months all she got was a chip in the boulder. To others it may have demotivated them after spending so much of their lives, but not Amara. To her it meant one thing, it was possible, she actually could do this. It fueled her with hope that she was beginning to lose, renewed her vigor and desire to learn. She ran back to the village this time knowing this is something she can do. Through all the criticism she began to hear support from the people around her. One month passed then another and another, the chip turning into a fracture, the fracture into a crack, with time it grew larger and larger

One year, at this point it had been over one year, her 53th attempt. She had grown a lot physically, mentally, and magically. She recently theorized a method to shape the wind orb and increase its power and today was the day for her to test it out. By this point the boulder was already half broken with a wide crack in it, months of her efforts. She began casting, the orb beginning to form, then she closed her eyes and squeezed her hand. The orb compressed and stretched slowly forming into a thin light green line. She squeezed harder, the line getting more compressed and thin as it grew in power beginning to affect the ground around it. The leaves on the ground began to swirl around her, the wind around her getting sucked into the line increasing its power. At last she opened her eyes and released the spell with a shout “Aeris!”, a burst of wind blasted forward blowing her hair back as it struck the rock. Thud! Crack!

She fell to her knees, hand aching from the strength she exerted casting the spell. Tears fell to the ground as she saw the sight before her, the boulder was split, and so was the tree behind it. The two halves rolled on their sides and the tree broke apart with a clean cut. She had finally done it after a year of hard work and effort. She stayed there crying and wiping her tears knowing her time wasn't wasted. Only once she truly let it all out did she stand up and began to return ready to share her success

She returned and rounded up a group of the villagers and showed off her achievement, those who criticized her were silent and those who supported her congratulated her. After this she would continue to practice and increase her control, she was confident within a few months she would be able to control wind almost seamlessly. She used her new powers to help the villagers and collect money in the process. Collecting apples, or pushing a wagon, all kinds of jobs for her goal, saving enough to attend an actual magic school.

After a few months the day she had been waiting for finally arrived. She stood in front of the orphanage after saying goodbye to the people she'd spent so long with ready to move onto the next stage of her life. The next few days would determine how her life went, but she was ready for it all. So she turned away and began heading to the wagon that would carry her there, looking forward to what would come next for her.

Legend/Key

Beginning, Middle, End - Separated by -----> -----

Theme, message, moral -

Setting -

Characters, People -

Climax - between ---> -----

Point of view (narrator) - Point of view

Dialogue -

Emotion - Emotions

Gestures(movement) -

Entertaining - 